Love, Jealously, Revenge and Marriage. The particulars of a cause of love unreciprocated, followed by dire vengeance, came to our knowledge on Saturday, of which the following is something like a fair round unvarnished statement. We introduce a fictitious name :

Mr. Jones, Lothario-like, was in the habit of paying his addresses to two young ladies at the one time, calling on them on alternate evenings. Miss Spriggins and Miss Smith were the two pretty-musliners, neat title, and novel, aint it?) the latter of whom had decidedly the affections of Mr. Jones in her keeping, while Miss Springging, from the attention bestowed, fancied she was the lone star which guided Mr. Jones' destiny. In short, neither knew of the other, each believed herself beloved and looked upon herself in the light of the future Mrs. J., and was supremely happy in her blissful ignorance. But a cloud burst over the tranquil pair, and jealousy took possession of Miss Smith. She discovered that she had a rival-that rival was pretty, and Spriggins. Oh! torture of heart; oh! racking of nerves oh! sleepless night: and oh! anxious day. She would die by arsenic, bed-cord, her father's razor, the Mississippi, charcoal, anything or every thing, to rid her of a life become hateful by the perfidy of Jones.
